Night-time photomontages show very good to excellent visibility conditions, with periphery wind turbines having 2000 candela red aviation warning lights on either side of the nacelle. These lights will flash simultaneously with a Morse W flash pattern and will also include an infra-red component. Marine navigational lights located at the platform level will not be visible, as they will be hidden in this long distance view by the curvature of the earth.
Night-time photomontages show very good to excellent visibility conditions, with periphery wind turbines having 2000 candela red aviation warning lights on either side of the nacelle. These lights will flash simultaneously with a Morse W flash pattern and will also include an infra-red component. Marine navigational lights located at the platform level will not be visible, as they will be hidden in this long distance view by the curvature of the earth.
Wind turbines with 2000 candela red aviation warning lights.

Photomontage view from Aldeburgh showing EA1N and EA2 15/19MW turbine layouts.

Existing view from Aldeburgh.

Night-time photomontages show very good to excellent visibility conditions, with periphery wind turbines having 2000 candela red aviation warning lights on either side of the nacelle. These lights will flash simultaneously with a Morse W flash pattern and will also include an infra-red component. Marine navigational lights located at the platform level will not be visible, as they will be hidden in this long distance view by the curvature of the earth.

Aldeburgh

Night-time photomontages show very good to excellent visibility conditions, with periphery wind turbines having 2000 candela red aviation warning lights on either side of the nacelle. These lights will flash simultaneously with a Morse W flash pattern and will also include an infra-red component. Marine navigational lights located at the platform level will not be visible, as they will be hidden in this long distance view by the curvature of the earth.